

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

The surface shape of a power-applying electrode is altered in agreement with the curving of a substrate so that the electrode-substrate distance can be kept at a constant value. This enables formation of thin films having uniform film thickness in the substrate width direction even when the electrode-substrate distance is shortened in order to make film formation rate higher in deposited-film formation apparatus of a roll-to-roll system.